FORMER FRENCH EQUATORIAL AFRICA

Both France and the four local governments are concerned over the stability of the ex-French colonies in equatorial Africa. France's affirmative response early this month to a request from President Bokarra of the Central African Republic for the airlift of troops to Bangui exemplifies its attitude toward the problem. Bokarra is anxious about alleged plotting by Finance Minister Banza, his chief adviser and principal potential rival. Bokassa also [REDACTED] accused the US of involvement in this plotting.

Of the four countries, uneasiness is most prevalent in Gabon. The possibility of turmoil following the seemingly imminent death of President Leon Mba appears to have both the French and local leaders jittery. The French are anxious to preserve their influence in Gabon, their primary source of uranium ore, but wish to avoid a repetition of their direct intervention in 1964 that squelched an otherwise successful coup.

In Chad, the two-year-old Muslim rebellion continues to escalate gradually. The French have stepped up their involvement in counterinsurgency operations there during the past year in an effort to keep President Tombalbaye in power.

Events in Congo (Brazzaville) remain shrouded in obscurity, but the deployment of French troops in Bangui is likely to have a sobering effect on anti-Western radicals there.

France has defense agreements with all four states, and maintenance-of-order accords with three of them. Under the latter, French troops may be called in to quell internal disorders in Gabon, Chad, and Congo. The airlift to Bangui, which augments standing French forces in Fort Lamy and Libreville, is a relatively low-cost preventive measure that gives reassurance to the governments of the area and food for thought to potential coup makers.
